THE STATE OF WASHINGTON on the Relation of J.V.G., Plaintiff, v. JON F. VAN GUILDER, Appellant, JENNIFER ANN VAN GUILDER, Respondent.

No. 57490-6-I

COURT OF APPEALS OF WASHINGTON, DIVISION ONE

137 Wn. App. 417; 154 P.3d 243; 2007 Wash. App. LEXIS 380

March 5, 2007, Filed

NOTICE:

[1] As amended by order of the Court of Appeals March 15, 2007.

SUBSEQUENT HISTORY: Amended by, Reconsideration granted by State ex rel J.V.G. v. Van Guildler, 2007 Wash. App. LEXIS 1327 (Wash. Ct. App., May 29, 2007)

CASE SUMMARY:

PROCEDURAL POSTURE: Petitioner, the State of Washington, petitioned for a modification reducing appellant father's child support obligation to his first child because he could not meet that obligation and the needs of his four other children from his second marriage. Appellee mother opposed the downward deviation. The King County Superior Court (Washington) found in favor of the mother and increased the father's monthly support payment to $1,216. He appealed.

OVERVIEW: The trial court should only have considered whether the deviation would result in insufficient funds to meet the child's basic needs. Instead the trial court appeared to have based its determination largely on the child's statutorily-extraordinary need to attend private school. The mother's private school tuition payments should not have been considered as part of the deviation determination because such payments were extraordinary expenses not considered part of the standard child support calculation. Thus, pursuant to Wash. Rev. Code § 26.19.075(1)(e)(iv), the trial court abused its discretion by failing to consider the total circumstances of both of the father's household and inappropriately basing the deviation determination on an extraordinary tuition expense rather than on whether the lesser amount would still be sufficient to meet the child's basic needs. Additionally, even if the trial court found that there was sufficient evidence of the child's need for private schooling, the inquiry could not end there. On remand, the trial court had to consider whether the father could afford to pay for private school, Wash. Rev. Code § 26.19.080(4).

OUTCOME: The appellate court reversed the trial court's judgment and remanded the case to the trial court. On remand, the trial court had to consider the total circumstances of both households in determining whether a downward deviation in the father's basic support obligation was appropriate. It also had to determine whether he had the ability to pay for private school and extracurricular activities.

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Standards of Review > General Overview

Family Law > Child Support > Obligations > Computation > Guidelines

[HN1] Generally, an appellate court reviews a superior court's ruling regarding child support deviation determinations, not a family court commissioner's. But when the superior court denies a motion for revision, it adopts the commissioner's findings, conclusions, and rulings as its own. Wash. Rev. Code § 2.24.050.

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Standards of Review > Abuse of DiscretionFamily Law > Child Support > Obligations > General Overview

[HN2] An appellate court reviews a trial court's child support determinations for abuse of discretion. A trial court abuses its discretion by making a decision based on untenable grounds or for untenable reasons.

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Standards of Review > Abuse of DiscretionFamily Law > Child Support > Obligations > General Overview

[HN3] A trial court does not abuse its discretion where the record shows that it considered all the relevant factors and the child support award is not unreasonable under the circumstances.

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Standards of Review > Fact & Law IssuesCivil Procedure > Appeals > Standards of Review > Substantial Evidence > Sufficiency of Evidence [HN4] Findings of fact supported by substantial evidence, i.e., evidence sufficient to persuade a rational person of the truth of the premise, will not be disturbed on appeal.

Family Law > Child Support > Obligations > Computation > Guidelines

[HN5] A trial court may deviate from the standard child support calculation based on one parent's financial obligations to children from another relationship who live with him, provided he is fulfilling his obligations to them.

Civil Procedure > Trials > Bench TrialsCivil Procedure > Appeals > Standards of Review > Substantial Evidence > General OverviewFamily Law > Child Support > Obligations > Computation > Guidelines

[HN6] Under Wash. Rev. Code § 26.19.075(1)(e)(iv), when a parent has children from another relationship, a court must consider the total circumstances of both households in deciding whether a deviation is appropriate. When a court chooses to grant or deny a request for deviation, it must provide specific reasons for its decision in written findings of fact, and those findings must be supported by substantial evidence.

Family Law > Child Support > Obligations > Computation > General Overview

[HN7] Child support is not a first-come, first-served proposition. Even though there is no explicit requirement that a trial court treat each child equally, it violates the purpose of the child support statute to create a situation where earlier-born children receive substantially more support than later-born children by virtue of an earlier child support order.

Family Law > Child Support > Obligations > Computation > Guidelines

[HN8] In a child support deviation determination, courts must consider the total circumstances of both households, without giving priority to certain children based on birth order.

Family Law > Child Support > Obligations > Computation > Guidelines

[HN9] Wash. Rev. Code § 26.19.075(1)(e) does not mention insufficient funds in a custodial parent's household as a limiting factor in a child support deviation determination. Wash. Rev. Code § 26.19.075(1)(d) is the only place where such a limitation is discussed and it qualifies that limitation, stating that a deviation is inappropriate if it will result in insufficient funds in the household receiving support to meet the basic needs of the child. Wash. Rev. Code § 26.19.075(1)(d). Reading Wash. Rev. Code § 26.19.075(1)(d) and (e) together and considering the legislature's intent that child support orders be adequate to meet a child's basic needs and to provide additional child support commensurate with the parents' income, resources, and standard of living, Wash. Rev. Code § 26.19.001, an appellate court holds that, when considering the total circumstances of both households, a court should first consider whether the basic needs of all the children can be met.

mining whether a child support deviation is justified and then applying that deviation proportionally to any approved extraordinary expenses. A court cannot properly consider extraordinary expenses as part of the deviation determination.

Family Law > Child Support > Obligations > Computation > General Overview

[HN11] Under Wash. Rev. Code § 26.19.080(3), private school tuition and special child rearing expenses are extraordinary expenses not included in the basic child support calculation. Wash. Rev. Code § 26.19.080(4).

Family Law > Child Support > Obligations > Computation > General Overview

[HN12] A trial court has discretion to determine the necessity for and reasonableness of payments in excess of the basic child support obligation.

Family Law > Child Support > Obligations > Computation > General Overview

[HN13] Wash. Rev. Code § 26.19.080(3) requires that extraordinary expenses shall be shared by the parents in the same proportion as the basic child support obligation.

Family Law > Child Support > Obligations > Computation > General Overview

[HN14] Once a trial court determines that extraordinary expenses are reasonable and necessary, it is required to allocate them proportionally.

Family Law > Child Support > Obligations > Computation > General Overview

[HN15] A noncustodial parent will not be obligated to pay for private school when acceptable public schools are available unless there is a showing of special circumstances justifying the need for private school education. A non-exclusive list of factors that might justify an award of tuition expenses included family tradition, religion, and past attendance at a private school.

Family Law > Child Support > Obligations > Computation > General Overview

[HN16] Requiring a trial court to make findings about a parent's ability to pay for extraordinary expenses whenever an objecting parent raises the issue is consistent with the legislative intent of the child support statutes that support orders be adequate to meet a child's basic needs and that additional support be ordered only when it is commensurate with the parents' income, resources, and standard of living. Wash. Rev. Code § 26.19.001.

Family Law > Child Support > Obligations > Computation > General Overview

[HN17] Part of a trial court's child support determination that extraordinary expenses are reasonable and necessary must involve a finding about a parent's ability to pay when that issue is raised.

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Costs & Attorney Fees > Attorney Expenses & Fees > Statutory Awards

[HN18] Wash. R. App. P. 18.1 and Wash. Rev. Code § 26.09.140 authorize an appellate court to order one party to pay the other's reasonable attorney fees based on a requesting party's demonstrated financial need and the other party's ability to pay.

SUMMARY:

Nature of Action: The State petitioned to modify a divorced father's child support obligation. The State sought to have the obligation reduced based on the father's inability to meet the current obligation while providing for the needs of his four other children from his second marriage.

Superior Court: The Superior Court for King County, No. 05-3-00167-8, Theresa B. Doyle, J., on November 22, 2005, entered a judgment increasing the father's child support obligation to include half of the tuition and extracurricular costs of the child's attendance at a private school.

Court of Appeals: Holding that the trial court abused its discretion by failing to consider the total financial circumstances of both the father's and mother's households in denying a downward deviation in the father's child support obligation and by requiring the father to pay half of the child's private school costs without first finding that the father could afford to do so, the court reverses the judgment and remands the case for further proceedings.

HEADNOTES

[1] Courts--Commissioners--Revision--Appellate Review--Decision Subject to Review. A superior court's denial of a motion to revise a commissioner's decision operates as an adoption of the commissioner's findings, conclusions, and rulings as the court's own, and appellate review is conducted upon such findings, conclusions, and rulings.

[2]Divorce--Child Support--Modification--Review--Standard of Review. An order modifying a parent's child support obligation is reviewed for an abuse of discretion. Discretion is abused if the order is based on untenable grounds or reasons. A child support modification order is based on untenable grounds or reasons if, in entering the order, the court did not consider all relevant factors and the award is unreasonable under the circumstances.

[3]Divorce--Child Support--Modification--Findings of Fact--Standard of Review. Findings of fact entered in support of a child support modification order are reviewed to determine whether they are supported by substantial evidence in the record. Substantial evidence is evidence sufficient to persuade a rational person of the truth of the premise.

[4]Divorce--Child Support--Child Support Schedule--Deviation--Parent's Support Obligation to Another Child--Consideration of Total Circumstances--Necessity. Under RCW 26.19.075(1)(e), a court determining a parent's child support obligation may deviate from the standard child support calculation based on the parent's financial obligations to children from another relationship who are living with that parent, provided that the parent fulfills the support obligation to those children. Under the statute, the court must consider the "total circumstances of both households" in deciding whether a deviation is appropriate.

[5]Divorce--Child Support--Child Support Schedule--Deviation--Findings of Fact--Necessity--In General. When a trial court grants or denies a request for a deviation from the standard child support calculation, it must provide specific reasons for its decision in written findings of fact, which must be supported by substantial evidence.

[6]Divorce--Child Support--Child Support Schedule--Deviation--Parent's Support Obligation to Another Child--Consideration of Total Circumstances--Equal Treatment. In a proceeding to modify the child support obligation of a parent who has become obligated to support later-born children, the court must consider the parent's total circumstances, without giving priority to the children based on their birth order. Child support is not a first-come, first-served proposition. The court may not allow earlier child support orders to determine the support the parent can provide to later-born children. Although there is no explicit requirement that the trial court treat each child equally, it violates the purpose of the child support statute to create a situation where earlier-born children receive substantially more support than later-born children by virtue of an earlier child support order.

[7]Divorce--Child Support--Child Support Schedule--Deviation--Parent's Support Obligation to Another Child--Consideration of Total Circumstances--Children's Basic Needs. In a proceeding to modify the child support obligation of a parent who has become obligated to support later-born children, the court's initial consideration is whether the basic needs of all of the children can be met. In considering whether a deviation would result in insufficient funds to meet a child's basic needs, the court should not consider extraordinary expenses not considered part of the standard child support calculation; i.e., the court may not properly consider extraordinary expenses as part of the deviation determination.

[8]Divorce--Child Support--Extraordinary Expenses--Shared Obligation--Mandatory Duty--Deviation. Under RCW 26.19.080(3), extraordinary child rearing expenses must be shared by parents in the same proportion as their basic child support obligation. Once the trial court determines that an extraordinary expense is "reasonable and necessary," it must allocate that expense proportionately between the parents. The court may deviate in allocating an extraordinary expense obligation if it first deviates from the basic support obligation.

[9]Divorce--Child Support--Extraordinary Expenses--Shared Obligation--Factors--Ability To Pay. When determining whether an extraordinary child rearing expense is "reasonable and necessary" and should be made part of a parent's support obligation, a court must consider the parent's ability to pay if the issue is raised.

[10]Divorce--Child Support--Education--Private Education. A noncustodial parent may be obliged to pay a share of a child's private schooling costs if special circumstances justify the need for a private school education. In determining whether to include private school expenses in a child support obligation, a court may consider family tradition, religion, and past attendance at a private school. Ability to pay also is a factor that the court should consider if the issue is raised.

[11]Divorce--Attorney Fees--On Appeal--Factors--Ability To Pay. An appellate court may decline to award attorney fees on appeal under RCW 26.09.140 if the requesting party has failed to demonstrate that the opposing party has the ability to pay.

OPINION

[244] [*420] [As amended by orders of the Court of Appeals March 15 and May 29, 2007.]

¶1 AGID, J. -- Jon and Jennifer Van Guilder are the divorced parents of J.V.G. Jon remarried and has four additional children. The State of Washington petitioned for modification of Jon's child support obligation to J.V.G. because he could not meet that obligation and the needs of his four other children from his second marriage. The State requested that Jon's monthly support obligation be reduced from $905 to $302. Jennifer opposed the downward deviation and petitioned for Jon to pay his proportional share of J.V.G.'s private school tuition and extracurricular activities in addition to his basic support obligation. The trial court found in favor of the mother and increased the father's monthly support payment to $1,216. We hold that the trial court abused [2] its discretion by failing to consider the total financial circumstances of both households in denying the downward deviation and requiring the father to pay for private school without making a finding that he could afford to do so. We reverse and remand.

FACTS

Dissolution and Child Support Order

¶2 A California court dissolved Jon and Jennifer Van Guilder's marriage in 1995, when their son, J.V.G., was three years old. Under the 1995 order, the court gave Jennifer primary physical custody and visitation to Jon. The court ordered Jon to pay a total of $905 monthly in child support. His original monthly support payment was $655 plus an additional $250 for daycare expenses. Jon remarried and has four other children with his current wife, a stay-at-home mother. He and his second family live in Ohio.

[*421] 2002 Parenting Plan

¶3 In 2002, Jennifer petitioned for modification of the 1995 parenting plan, alleging that Jon and his current wife abused J.V.G., causing him emotional harm. At the time, Jon was moving to the Midwest with his second family and did not appear at the hearing. The court heard testimony from Jennifer, J.V.G.'s therapist, and a family observer. It granted the [3] modification, giving [245] Jennifer sole decision-making authority and requiring that Jon's visits be supervised until he and his wife submitted to an anger management and domestic violence assessment. Jennifer did not attempt to modify Jon's child support obligation at this hearing. Jon did not appeal the order. J.V.G. attends regular counseling sessions to deal with his emotional problems.

Private School Education

¶4 J.V.G. has always attended private school. Both parents chose to send him to Providence Classical Christian School (PCCS), a private school. After PCCS relocated from Bellevue to Bothell, Jennifer decided to move J.V.G. to a more expensive private school closer to her home. Apparently, J.V.G.'s counselor teaches at the new school and recommended it to Jennifer.¹ No court has ever required John to pay for J.V.G. to attend private school.²

1 This is based solely on the mother's affidavit.

2 Private school was not included in the original support order.

Procedural History

¶5 [4] At some point, Jon fell behind in his child support payments for J.V.G., and the State began collecting his payments and arrearages. On June 24, 2005, the State filed a petition to modify Jon's child support obligation to J.V.G. based on his changed financial situation as a result of his four additional children. The State recommended a downward deviation from the standard obligation to $302 monthly based on the "whole family" formula. On June 29, [*422] 2005, Jennifer filed a motion for adjustment, seeking an increase in Jon's support payments to cover his proportional share of J.V.G.'s tuition and extracurricular activities. She failed to timely serve the State with her motion for adjustment. The family court commissioner dismissed the motion and directed the parties to deal with both the downward deviation and the request for private school tuition at the modification hearing in the form of trial by affidavit.

¶6 Jennifer submitted an affidavit asserting that Jon should contribute to J.V.G.'s private school tuition, counseling, and extracurricular activities because they were necessary given his history of participating in such activities and his emotional problems stemming from abuse by [5] his father. Jon, appearing pro se telephonically from Ohio, opposed the increase and asked for a downward deviation based on his financial circumstances. The State presented its original request for a downward deviation based on Jon's additional four children but did not advocate on his behalf, choosing instead to defer to the court on all issues.

137 Wn. App. 417, *; 154 P.3d 243, **;
2007 Wash. App. LEXIS 380, ***

¶7 The commissioner pro tempore denied Jon's request for a downward deviation because it "would leave insufficient funds in the custodial parent's household" and ordered him to pay $1,216 in monthly child support for J.V.G. The court based this $311 increase in the father's monthly support payments on his proportional half of J.V.G.'s private school tuition and extracurricular activities. The court calculated the father's basic monthly child support obligation at $666 and his proportional share of J.V.G.'s tuition and extracurricular activities at $550. The court found that this extra expense was justified by J.V.G.'s history of private school attendance, his mother's sole decision-making authority, and her affidavit stating that his counselor recommended the school. The court denied the mother's request that Jon contribute to J.V.G.'s counseling, [6] stating that it is part of ordinary monthly health care.

¶8 While Jennifer supports herself and J.V.G. on $5,000 a month, Jon makes approximately $5,541 monthly and [*423] must support four other children and his wife on that salary. Jon submitted a number of financial documents to show the financial hardship the court's failure to grant a downward deviation would impose on his second family. The court made no findings about how these increased child support payments would affect Jon's other children or whether Jon could afford to pay for private school and extracurricular activities given his other obligations. The superior court denied Jon's motion seeking revision of the commissioner pro tempore's ruling. Jon appeals.

[246] DISCUSSION

[1-3]¶9 [HN1] Generally, we review the superior court's ruling, not the commissioner's.³ But when the superior court denies a motion for revision, it adopts the commissioner's findings, conclusions, and rulings as its own.⁴ [HN2] We review a trial court's child support determinations for abuse of discretion.⁵ A trial court abuses its discretion by making a decision based on " 'untenable grounds or for untenable reasons.' "⁶ [HN3] A trial court does not abuse its discretion where the record [7] shows that it considered all the relevant factors and the child support award is not unreasonable under the circumstances.⁷ [HN4] Findings of fact supported by substantial evidence, i.e., evidence sufficient to persuade a rational person of the truth of the premise, will not be disturbed on appeal.⁸

[*424] I. Downward Deviation

[4-7]¶10 [HN5] A trial court may deviate from the standard child support calculation based on one parent's financial obligations to children from another relationship who live with him, provided he is fulfilling his obligations to them.⁹ [HN6] Under RCW 26.19.075(1)(e)(iv), when a parent has children from another relationship, the court must consider the "total circumstances of both households" in deciding whether a deviation is appropriate. When a court chooses to grant or deny a request for deviation, it must provide " 'specific reasons' " for its decision in written findings of fact, and those findings must be supported by substantial evidence.¹⁰

9 Fernando v. Nieswandt, 87 Wn. App. 103, 111, 940 P.2d 1380, review denied, 133 Wn.2d 1014 (1997).

10 In re Marriage of Bell, 101 Wn. App. 366, 371, 4 P.3d 849 (2000) (quoting RCW 26.19.075(2)).

¶11 [9] Here, the trial court denied the father's request for a downward deviation because it found that reducing his support payments from the standard calculation of $666 to the State's proposed $302 "would leave insufficient funds in the custodial parent's household." The father challenges this ruling, arguing that its factual underpinnings are not based on substantial evidence and that the trial court abused its discretion by failing to consider the total circumstances of both households.

¶12 The father relies on our holding in In re Marriage of Bell that a court abuses its discretion when it allows earlier child support orders to determine the amount of support to which later-born children are entitled.¹¹ In Bell, we stated that "[c]hild [HN7] support is not a first-come, first-served proposition."¹² Even though there is no explicit requirement that the trial court treat each child equally, it violates the purpose of the child support statute to create a situation where earlier-born children receive substantially more support [*425] than later-born children by virtue of an earlier child support order.¹³ The mother argues that Bell is factually distinguishable from this case because [10] it involved a support order for later-born children based on a preexisting support order for children from an earlier relationship and none of the children lived with the parent requesting the downward deviation.¹⁴ These are distinctions [247] without a difference. The underlying policy of the child support statute as explained in Bell is that [HN8] courts must consider the total circumstances of both households, without giving priority to certain children based on birth order. That principle applies equally to the facts of this case. Certainly the fact that the father's four other children live with him does not somehow negate his support obligation to them.¹⁵

15 Fernando, 87 Wn. App. at 111.

¶13 It is clear from the record that the trial court did not consider the total circumstances of both households before denying the father's request for a downward deviation. [11] In fact, the court implied that the issue of how much support J.V.G. is entitled to is completely separate from the issue of how much support the other four children will receive. When the father tried to explain the hardship an increase in his support payments would work on his second family, the court replied:

Well, Mr. Van Guilder, both you and your current wife have an obligation to support the children you have, and you have ... an independent obligation to support the child you have with [J.V.G.]'s mother.

This statement runs contrary to the statute and our holding in Bell that courts must consider the needs of all the children to whom the parent seeking deviation owes a duty of support.¹⁶

16 101 Wn. App. at 373.

¶14 The court also appears to have based its finding that a downward deviation would leave insufficient funds in the [*426] mother's household on inappropriate evidence. [HN9] RCW 26.19.075(1)(e) does not mention insufficient funds in the custodial [12] parent's household as a limiting factor in the deviation determination. Subsection (1)(d) of that statute is the only place where such a limitation is discussed and it qualifies that limitation, stating that a deviation is inappropriate if it

"will result in insufficient funds in the household receiving support to meet the basic needs of the child."¹⁷ Reading the subsections together and considering the legislature's intent that child support orders be "adequate to meet a child's basic needs and to provide additional child support commensurate with the parents' income, resources, and standard of living,"¹⁸ we hold that, when considering the total circumstances of both households, a court should first consider whether the basic needs of all the children can be met.

17 RCW 26.19.075(1)(d) (emphasis added).

18 RCW 26.19.001.

¶15 The trial court should have considered only whether the deviation would result in insufficient funds to meet J.V. [13] G.'s basic needs. Instead, the court appears to have based its determination largely on J.V.G.'s extraordinary need to attend private school:

And that's my finding today is that if I were to deviate, it would, uh?--it would leave insufficient funds. I did review the mother's financial declaration.

Uhm, she does have a pretty significant cost for education expenses but, again, that was based on the parties having previously agreed and mother now having sole decision-making.

The mother's private school tuition payments should not have been considered as part of the deviation determination because such payments are extraordinary expenses not considered part of the standard child support calculation.¹⁹ In In re Yeamans, we clearly stated that [HN10] the appropriate procedure for determining the allocation of extraordinary [*427] expenses requires first determining whether a deviation is justified and then applying that deviation proportionally to any approved extraordinary expenses.²⁰ A court cannot properly consider extraordinary expenses as part of the deviation determination.²¹ We hold that the pro tempore commissioner and the trial court abused their discretion [14] by failing to consider the total circumstances of both households and inappropriately basing the deviation determination [248] on an extraordinary tuition expense rather than on whether the lesser amount would still be sufficient to meet J.V.G.'s basic needs. We remand this case for a determination of whether a downward deviation is warranted under RCW 26.19.075(1)(e)(iv), based on the total circumstances of both households and considering the basic needs of all five children.

II. Private School Tuition and Extracurricular Expenses

A. Effect of Father's Request for a Downward Deviation

[8]¶16 The father argues he should not be obligated to pay the extraordinary expenses of private school tuition and extracurricular activities when he is requesting a downward deviation because he cannot afford to meet even his basic child support obligations. [HN11] Under [15] RCW 26.19.080(3), private school tuition and "special child rearing expenses" are extraordinary expenses not included in the basic child support calculation. [HN12] The trial court has discretion to determine the "necessity for and reasonableness of" payments in excess of the basic child support obligation.²² [HN13] RCW 26.19.080(3) requires that extraordinary expenses "shall be shared by the parents in the same proportion as the basic child support obligation." In Yeamans, we held that "[o]nce [HN14] the trial court determines that extraordinary expenses are 'reasonable and necessary,' " it is required to [*428] allocate them proportionally.²³ We reversed an order that denied the mother's request for a downward deviation in her basic support obligation but forced the father to pay for 100 percent of the child's extraordinary travel expenses.²⁴ The remand required the trial court to reconsider the deviation determination and reallocate the extraordinary expenses accordingly.²⁵ The same considerations apply here. If, on remand, the lower court finds a downward deviation is justified under RCW 26.19.075(1)(e)(iv), it [16] must proportionately decrease any extraordinary expense allocation it deems reasonable and necessary.

B. Ability To Pay

[9, 10]¶17 In In re Marriage of Stern, we held that [HN15] a noncustodial parent should not be obligated to pay for private school when acceptable public schools are available unless there is a "showing of special circumstances justifying the need for private school education."²⁶ We provided a nonexclusive list of factors that might justify an award of tuition expenses, including "family tradition, religion, and past attendance at a private school."²⁷ In In re Marriage of Vander Veen, this court held that including private school tuition as part [17] of child support was justified because the Stern factors were present: the family had a tradition of attending Christian schools, the parents had agreed to send their children to Christian school, and the children had always attended Christian school.²⁸

¶18 The father contends that his ability to pay for private school and extracurricular activities must be taken [*429] into consideration as part of the court's determination about the "reasonableness" and "necessity" of such extraordinary expenses,²⁹ essentially asking that we add an "ability to pay" prong to the Stern test. Stern and Vander Veen are the only published Washington cases that address the issue of a noncustodial parent's obligation to pay for private schooling. The ability to pay for such schooling was not at issue in either case. But we based our holding in Stern largely on In re Marriage of Aylesworth, a California case that held a court does not abuse [18] its discretion by ordering a parent to pay for private school where there is substantial evidence [249] of the child's need for private schooling and the objecting parent's ability to pay for it.³⁰

¶19 We have required consideration of a parent's ability to pay in a similar context. In In re Marriage of Shellenberger, we cited Stern and Vander Veen as support for the proposition that a "trial court should not require objecting parents of modest means to pay for private college where the child can obtain a degree in his or her chosen field at a publicly subsidized institution."³¹ In Shellenberger, we held that the lower court abused its discretion by failing to make findings about the father's ability to pay college tuition while still meeting the support needs of his minor child from another relationship. [19] ³² Although Shellenberger dealt with postsecondary education, its policy considerations are equally applicable here. [HN16] Requiring the trial court to make findings about a parent's ability to pay for extraordinary expenses whenever the objecting parent raises the issue is consistent with the legislative intent of the child support statutes that support orders be "adequate to meet a child's basic needs" and that additional support be ordered only [*430] when it is "commensurate with the parents' income, resources, and standard of living."³³

¶20 Because Yeamans requires that extraordinary expenses be allocated in the same manner as the basic support obligation,³⁴ part of determining which extraordinary expenses will be allowed must involve a determination of the objecting parent's ability to pay. The court cannot bleed a stone. But that is the result of support orders [20] which require payment of extraordinary expenses beyond a parent's means. If a court determines that a parent can afford to contribute only 25 percent of his child's basic support needs, it is unlikely that he will be able to afford 25 percent of any additional extraordinary expenses on top of his basic support obligation. We hold that [HN17] part of a trial court's determination that extraordinary expenses are reasonable and necessary must involve a finding about the parent's ability to pay when that issue is raised. Even if the trial court finds that there is sufficient evidence of J.V.G.'s need for private schooling, the inquiry cannot end there. On remand, the lower court must consider whether the father can afford to pay for private school before ordering him to do so.

III. Attorney Fees

[11]¶21 The father seeks attorney fees under [HN18] RAP 18.1 and RCW 26.09.140, which authorizes the appellate court to order one party to pay [21] the other's reasonable attorney fees based on the requesting party's demonstrated financial need and the other party's ability to pay.³⁵ While the father has established a need for attorney fees, J.V.G.'s mother has failed to properly provide this court with a financial affidavit under RAP 18.1(c). Based on the limited financial information we have for the mother, it appears she has the resources to pay at least some portion of the father's attorney fees. Accordingly, we grant the father's request for [*431] reasonable attorney fees and costs in an amount to be determined by a commissioner of this court.

35 In re Marriage of Kimpel, 122 Wn. App. 729, 735, 94 P.3d 1022 (2004), amended on recons., 2004 Wash. App. LEXIS 2939 (Dec. 2, 2004).

¶22 We reverse and remand. On remand, the trial court is to consider the total circumstances of both households in determining whether a downward deviation in the father's basic support obligation is appropriate under RCW 26.19.075(1)(e)(iv). It must also determine whether he has the ability to pay for private school and extracurricular activities as part of deciding whether these extraordinary expenses are necessary and reasonable under RCW 26.19.080(4) [22] .
